A-Raf and B-Raf kinases play a central role in the Raf/MEK/ERK signaling pathway, and their role in lung cancer pathogenesis is a focus of current research. Analysis of the genomic sequences of A-Raf and B-Raf revealed two exons each of which encode the kinase domains. We have developed a reverse phase protein array (RPPA) that can characterize the expression and phosphorylation of A-Raf and B-Raf proteins as well as the activity of their common downstream target, ERK1/2. These phospho-serines and -threonines can be recognized by antibodies, enabling analysis of the relative levels and phosphorylation state of A-Raf and B-Raf proteins in human clinical samples. We have previously shown that the degree of phosphorylation of the A-Raf and B-Raf proteins is a strong and independent predictor of tumor relapse in patients with non-small cell lung cancer. Here we extend these studies to a larger cohort of disease-free and lung cancer-free individuals and demonstrate a correlation between the copy numbers of the A-Raf and B-Raf genes and phospho-A-Raf and phospho-B-Raf protein levels. As these proteins are central to the growth of lung cancers, our approach provides a means of characterizing their expression patterns in a clinical setting. The ability to assess these proteins with RPPA will enable the monitoring of changes in signaling pathway activity in lung cancers over time and the correlation of those changes with disease outcome.
